Bachelor of Psychology,
graduated 2004

Master of Conflict Management,

In a world where conflict is all too common, Gayathiri Jambulingam is fighting the good fight, focusing her Masters studies around the positive ways to resolve conflict before it reaches the courtroom.

Gayathiri completed her undergraduate studies at UniSA and knew that with the University's international perspective and experienced staff, her interest in international conflict would be well-supported.

"UniSA lecturers have high credibility and that gave me so much confidence in the Masters program," says Gayathiri. "Many have travelled and worked overseas so they have a very good knowledge of various cultures, and as an international student it helps to have a multicultural approach."

Collaborating with UniSA's diverse mix of postgraduate students has been another highlight for Gayathiri, giving her the chance to work with students of different ages and from a variety of cultural backgrounds. She has also established a healthy social life outside of the lecture theatre, attending UniSA events and activities, joining and starting social clubs, becoming a student representative, and networking with the help of her International Student Adviser.

"UniSA makes international students feel so welcome and offers many opportunities for local and international students to mingle," she says. "It's all about being adventurous, trying different things and taking the initiative."

Eventually, Gayathiri hopes to pursue her career in Adelaide, but knows the skills, experience and qualifications she's gaining through postgraduate study – and studying overseas – will be highly regarded around the world.

"Studying overseas gives you a broad perspective and you become very well-rounded, academically and socially," she says. "I think the job prospects after finishing postgraduate study at UniSA are quite high and I know I'll be more employable because of the experience."
